

THE WORLD'S FAIR.

It would be a very unfortunate thing if the people of the United States, especially such of them as have it in their power to create and direct public sentiment, should, either through indifference or even a less defensible feeling, evince less interest in the success of the Columbian International Exhibition than the people of foreign countries are doing. It cannot justly be said that, thus far, the newspaper press of this country has exhibited too great a measure of enthusiasm with regard to this great undertaking, or that they have done all that they could to uphold and strengthen the hands of those public-spirited citizens of the West, and of Chicago especially, in their efforts to make the proposed Exposition of the world's arts and sciences commensurate with the dignity of the great nation that has made itself responsible for it, and that has invited the several countries of the globe to unite with it in making the undertaking all that its promoters would have it, to wit: Superior in the variety and importance of its exhibits to any of its predecessors.

Local jealousies, of confidence in the ability of Chicago to do the great work assigned it, and a too common feeling, expressed by the most languid interest in the national as well as of the international character of the World's Fair of 1893, have all operated to its disadvantage. It is time now assuredly, if it never was before, that indifference, or veiled antagonism or captious criticism of the Fair and its management should cease, as it is apparent that the greatest nations of the Old World, as Great Britain, Germany, France, Russia, Austria, China and Japan, have been thoroughly impressed with the dignity and importance of the Columbian Exposition, and have given satisfactory testimony to the interest they feel in it through their declared determination to make exhibits superior to any they have made at any similar exhibition.

Dr. George B. Loring, whose death has been recently announced, distinguished himself most by his efforts to raise the Commissioner-ship of Agriculture to the dignity of a distinct department of the Government. His efforts were only successful after his retirement as Commissioner, and he never became what he always hoped to be—a member of the President's Cabinet. Born in North Andover, Massachusetts, in 1817, and educated as a physician he turned his attention to politics at an early age. Beginning as Postmaster of Salem, he occupied many distinguished State and national offices, being one of the Centennial Commissioners, President of the State Senate, Congressman and Commissioner of Agriculture. In March of last year he was appointed Minister to Portugal, but ill health forced him to resign, after occupying the post only a little over a year. During his long life he was devoted to the subject of practical and scientific agriculture and wrote a number of pamphlets on this subject. Had he carried through his scheme of making agriculture one of the departments and been selected to fill the position he would have undoubtedly made the position one of honor to himself and of great benefit to the nation.

Balmaceda is dead. It is a good thing, probably the best thing he ever did when he shot himself. A lover of freedom and an exponent of republican government will admire him for it. Balmaceda had had the nerve to take his own medicine and the world is now rid of a tyrant and a man who was anxious to pass a monarchy into the hands of posterity. Balmaceda is a nice fellow.
